Subcutaneous fat and water metabolism in growing pigs and juvenile pigs with an experimentally-induced edema. The use of ultrasonic technology to measure fat and water tissue thickness and cross-sectional area was evaluated for its ability to measure changes in tissue characteristics of subcutaneous fat and water in growing pigs. This technology provided estimates of the tissue thickness and cross-sectional area that were highly correlated with histological measurements ($r = 0.97$ and $r = 0.97$, respectively). Ultrasonic estimates of tissue cross-sectional area in control pigs were $16.6 \pm 0.3 \text{ mm}^2$. In pigs with experimentally-induced edema, ultrasound estimates of tissue cross-sectional area were 40.7 ± 4.0 and $45.4 \pm 2.4 \text{ mm}^2$ in the control group and the edema group, respectively (P the Government would allow the stowaway to remain on board until the vessel reached Singapore.
